Surround Sound System

Room Size: The length, height and depth of your viewing room play an important role in your home theater system's audio effectiveness. If your room is small, a sound bar may suffice, but if it is large surround sound will more effectively fill the pockets of the room furthest from the television.

Viewing distance: If you have a large television, and you sit further away from the screen, it will be important to bring the sound closer to you via a surround sound system. If the seating arrangement is closer to the television a sound bar may be the way to go.

Acoustic Tips For Your Home Theater Room

More than you might realize, your room plays a large part in how your home theater system sounds. Luckily there are a few things you can do to improve your room's acoustic quality and the sound you'll get out of your system:

Place your speakers carefully – experiment with speaker placement in your room. See if your front speaker sounds better facing directly into the room or slightly angled. Does your center channel sound better above or below the TV? Do your surround speakers sound better facing straight or angled toward the main listening position?

Wall Mounting Your TV Is The Safest Option With Kids

Lots of folks bought a new TV in time to enjoy the Super Bowl and often the old TV winds up in a bedroom. It's crucial to ensure that any TV in your home is installed in a way that doesn't pose a hazard to kids. Televisions were involved in furniture tip-over accidents that killed 206 children ages 8 and younger in the United States during the years 2000 to 2011, according to the Consumer Product Safety Commission. And in the years 2009-2011 alone, 12,700 children under age 10 were brought to hospital emergency departments due to injuries involving TV tip-overs, the CPSC reported. The problem involves both older tube TVs and newer flat-screen models. Fortunately, with either type of TV, such tragedies are easily prevented.
